Zelensky to meet Trump on Monday

Trump puts onus on Kyiv even as Putin remains adamant

BLOOMBERG
August 16

PRESIDENT VOLODYMYR Zelensky will meet Donald Trump on Monday as he and European allies push for a tri-lateral summit with Vladimir Putin despite signs the Russian leader isn't open to concessions to end the war in Ukraine. "Ukraine reaffirms its readiness to work with maximum effort to achieve peace," Zelensky said in a social media post after a call with Trump on Saturday. Trump confirmed the Ukrainian president's visit to Washington in a Truth Social post, and said a meeting with Putin and Zelensky could be scheduled "if all works out."

Zelensky and European leaders spoke with Trump as the US president flew back from Friday's talks in Alaska with Putin that failed to deliver a path to end the war, currently halfway through its fourth year. Still, Trump called his meeting productive, and signalled he would tell Zelenskiy to make a deal. Trump

PEACE TALKS

- Zelensky said Ukraine remains fully committed to pursuing peace
- Trump confirmed Zelensky's upcoming Washington visit and floated a possible three-way meeting with Putin said on the call that while it's up to Ukraine to decide on what to do with its territory, Putin's stance hasn't changed — he still wants Kyiv to cede control of the entire Donbas region in Ukraine's east, according to people familiar with the matter who spoke on condition on anonymity. Trump told the leaders that he was prepared to contribute to guaranteeing Ukraine's security as long as it didn't involve NATO, they added. The president suggested Putin would be OK with that, the people said. The US president said in the post that his meeting with Putin and the call with Zelenskiy both went "very well." Trump wrote that "it was determined by all" that the best way to end the war was to achieve a peace agreement and "not a mere Ceasefire Agreement." The statement comes after Trump said previously that a ceasefire would be his key demand of Putin at the summit. He also threatened to walk out of the meeting and to impose new tough punitive measures if it wasn't met. Monday's visit to the White House raises the stakes for Zelenskiy, who's had an uneasy relationship with Trump. His last visit in the Oval Office in February descended in a shouting match between the two leaders and briefly led to the US pausing military aid to Ukraine, which undercut the country's fighting capabilities. Trump and Zelenskiy have since met repeatedly, including at the NATO leaders summit in Hague and at the Vatican, and patch up their ties.

ready to be part of security guarantees for Ukraine. "And the good news is that America is ready to participate in such security guarantees and is not leaving it to the Europeans alone," Merz told German media after being briefed with other European leaders by Trump on his talks with Putin.

Airbus nears record long held by Boeing

August 16

IN 1981, THE year Airbus SE announced it would build a new single-aisle jetliner to take on Boeing, the 737 ruled the roost. The US-made narrow-body, already in use for more than a decade, had reshaped the airline industry by making shorter routes cheaper and more profitable to operate. By 1988, when Airbus began producing its upstart A320, Boeing had built a formidable lead by delivering some 1,500 of its cigar-shaped bestseller. It's taken the better part of four decades, but Airbus has finally caught up: The A320 series is poised to overtake its US competitor as the most-delivered commercial airliner in history, according to aviation consultancy Cirium. As of early August, Airbus had won the gap to just 20 units, with 12,155 lifetime A320-family shipments, according to the data. That difference is likely to disappear as soon as next month.

"Did anyone back then expect it could become number one – and on such high production volumes?" Max Kingsley-Jones, head of advisory at Cirium Ascend, wrote of the A320 in a recent social-media post. "I certainly didn't, and nor probably did Airbus." The A320's success mirrors the European planemaker's decades-long rise from fledgling planemaker to serious contender, and finally Boeing's better. By the early 2000s, annual deliveries of the A320 and its derivatives had surpassed the 737 family; total orders eclipsed the Boeing jet in 2019. But the 737 stubbornly remained the most-delivered commercial aircraft of all time.

At the outset, Airbus faced an uphill battle. The European planemaker, an assemblage of aerospace manufacturers formed in 1970 with backing from European governments, didn't yet offer a full aircraft lineup. Infighting hindered everything from product planning to manufacturing,

737 VS A320

■ As of August, Airbus had won the gap to just 20 units, with 12,155 lifetime A320-family shipments. The difference will disappear next month

■ Airbus aircraft are by far the most widely flown category in commercial aviation, typically connecting city pairs on shorter routes

■ The A320 series is poised to overtake its US competitor, the 737, as the most-delivered commercial airliner in history and leadership decisions had to finely balance French and German commercial and political interests.

Yet it was clear even then that Airbus needed a presence in the narrowbody segment to firmly establish itself as Boeing's top rival. Those aircraft are by far the most widely flown category in commercial aviation, typically connecting city pairs on shorter routes.

Higher fuel costs and the deregulation of the US aviation industry in the late 1970s had given the European plane-maker an opening with American airline executives, who clamored for an all-new single-aisle, according to a history of Airbus written by journalist Nicola Clark.

To set the A320 apart, Airbus took some risks. It selected digital fly-by-wire controls that saved weight over traditional hydraulic systems, and gave pilots a side-stick at their right or left hand instead of a centrally mounted yoke. The aircraft also sat higher off the ground than the 737 and came with a choice of two engines, giving customers greater flexibility. Airbus's gamble paid off. Today, the A320 and 737 make up nearly half of the global passenger jet fleet in service. And the A320's success contrasts with strategic blunders like the A380 behemoth that proved short-lived because airlines couldn't profitably operate the giant plane. Boeing maintained that smaller, nimbler planes like the 787 Dreamliner would have an edge—a prediction that proved right.

BLOOMBERG August 16

IN 1981, THE year Airbus SE announced it would build a new single-aisle jetliner to take on Boeing, the 737 ruled the roost. The US-made narrow-body, already in use for more than a decade, had reshaped the airline industry by making shorter routes cheaper and more profitable to operate. By 1988, when Airbus began producing its upstart A320, Boeing had built a formidable lead by delivering some 1,500 of its cigar-shaped bestseller.

It's taken the better part of four decades, but Airbus has finally caught up: The A320 series is poised to overtake its US competitor as the most-delivered commercial airliner in history, according to aviation consultancy Cirium. As of early August, Airbus had winnowed the gap to just 20 units, with 12,155 lifetime A320-family shipments, according to the data. That difference is likely to disappear as soon as next month.

"Did anyone back then expect it could become number one — and on such high production volumes?" Max Kingsley-Jones, head of advisory at Cirium Ascend, wrote of the A320 in a recent social-media post. "I certainly didn't, and nor probably did Airbus." The A320's success mirrors the European planemaker's decades-long rise from fledgling planemaker to serious contender, and finally Boeing's better. By the early 2000s, annual deliveries of the A320 and its derivatives had surpassed the 737 family; total orders eclipsed the Boeing jet in 2019. But the 737 stubbornly remained the most-delivered commercial aircraft of all time.

At the outset, Airbus faced an uphill battle. The European planemaker, an assemblage of aerospace manufacturers formed in 1970 with backing from European governments, didn't yet offer a full aircraft lineup. Infighting hindered everything from product planning to manufacturing,

■ As of August, Airbus had winnowed the gap to just 20 units, with 12,155 lifetime A320-family shipments. The difference will disappear next month

■ Airbus aircraft are by far the most widely flown category in commercial aviation, typically connecting city pairs on shorter routes

■ The A320 series is poised to overtake its US competitor, the 737, as the most-delivered commercial airliner in history

and leadership decisions had to finely balance French and German commercial and political interests.

Yet it was clear even then that Airbus needed a presence in the narrowbody segment to firmly establish itself as Boeing's top rival. Those aircraft are by far the most widely flown category in commercial aviation, typically connecting city pairs on shorter routes.

Higher fuel costs and the

deregulation of the US aviation industry in the late 1970s had given the European plane-maker an opening with American airline executives, who clamored for an all-new single-aisle, according to a history of Airbus written by journalist Nicola Clark.

To set the A320 apart, Airbus took some risks. It selected digital fly-by-wire controls that saved weight over traditional hydraulic systems, and gave pilots a side-stick at their right or left hand instead of a centrally mounted yoke. The aircraft also sat higher off the ground than the 737 and came with a choice of two engines, giving customers greater flexibility. Airbus's gamble paid off. Today, the A320 and 737 make up nearly half of the global passenger jet fleet in service. And the A320's success contrasts with strategic blunders like the A380 behemoth that proved short-lived because airlines couldn't profitably operate the giant plane. Boeing maintained that smaller, nimbler planes like the 787 Dreamliner would have an edge — a prediction that proved right.
